ANCIENT SPIRIT, MODERN MIND

Some of the reasons why you should not drive through the construction zone:

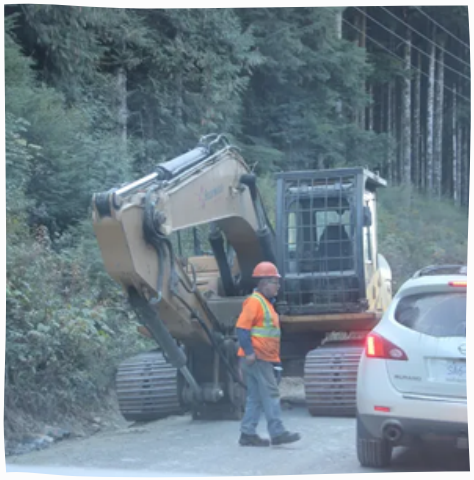

The crew is busy repairing many culverts for proper drainage. This is creating very large holes in the road that would be hard to see, especially in the dark.

Equipment could potentially be left on the road so crew members can pick up where they left off the next day. These could block your way causing you to have to have to turn around and go all the way back to the detour.

Unexpected traffic puts the road crew at risk. They work around noisy equipment, may have hearing protection on, and will not hear traffic coming from behind them.

Vehicles driving through the construction site can also, cause damage to the road setting progress back and making the road project take longer.

If you were to have an accident, get a flat, or your vehicle was to break down, you could potentially be stuck there for a very long time as no other traffic will be coming along.
